Lightroom is a mature product and one that should work on any Mac system. Many years ago, however, performance was not a big concern, because most work was still done on a PC with a mouse and keyboard. Today, the performance of these software is better than ever. Today, the biggest issue is simply the memory needed for the older software, many who still use Lightroom 5 on a Day-One upgrade. That is a lot of memory used for just viewing, or one could say, "viewing" a small subset of an image. The clean interface will really appeal to those who like to have their pictures look awesome out of the box, and the new MyPaint feature should offer a fresh new approach to digital painting. The GPU-optimized software will be especially useful for creative professionals on the go, where they can work more efficiently and productively than they could before. However, the latest version of Photoshop CC does introduce a number of worthwhile features for power users. It offers a new integrated scanner mask for photos, a new and smoothly upgraded retouching Lasso tool, Marker tools can now track faces in a group portrait, and it's faster than ever, with AI, GPU and machine learning technology ensuring that any edits you make are now better than ever. It's also possible to make your entire file the basis of a separate layer, which will let you crop and resize Photos A and B, for example. There's also a new output panel with the option to create print-ready PDFs, and a new hue and saturation slider for color changes.
