Easy to use, yet powerful, what more could one ask for? Yet the 2015 update seems to have made growing your own plants in Photoshop something of a chore. It's a fun tool, but most of the time it's just so damn frustrating. The fact that you have to resize the image, crop, and then paste something else onto it just to get that darn plant into the composition makes it seem like a waste of time, if not a bit poorly implemented. As mentioned in the opening paragraph, painting in Adobe Photoshop is the best it's ever been, though hard to effectively use in a compositionally correct matter without some serious photo editing skills. Other great features include the Quick Filter mechanism, which has practically become an indispensible tool for wedding photographers, wedding videographers, and any other professionals who handle a healthy number of images on a regular basis. Adobe consistently puts out several of the best, most cutting-edge features around. It's a true powerhouse of a product, and models Adobe's own capabilities for greatness. In short, any individual who has dedicated considerable time to serious photo editing will find much of PhotographyPRO's utility. In other words, if you do some serious retouching with Photoshop, and feel that the awesome tools it provides are truly the best there is for creating a finished sense of quality, PhotographyPRO's usefulness will become apparent to you. There are some noticeable drawbacks to using any of the time-honored tools. For some reason, Adobe seems to take things like image sharpness and lasso selection tools a bit more lazily than before. The Studio Aura Toolbar for Lightroom and Photoshop is a good one. It's a solid tool, but there are some lag and performance issues with it. And there are still occasional crashes or hangs, which may just be Adobe's incompetence in error handling. Certainly, Photoshop's interface can also benefit from some work. I find that the typical Photoshop's used to work with images that are in the 5-10MP range to be very inadequate.

Having performed a miracle during an icon of the Virgin Mary's died, he tried to contact the bishop of Shaqfeh to ask him for prayers to those of the Holy See, but without success.
